At a time when American consumers have been hard hit by sky-high heating and gas costs, ExxonMobil, the world's largest oil company, is poised to announce its 2005 annual profits of roughly $32 billion - the largest corporate profits in U.S. history.

Consumer and environmental groups will comment on the company's egregious record of spending its profits on undermining efforts to slow global warming, maintaining American dependence on oil, lobbying to drill in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, and refusing to pay its court-ordered debts to communities devastated by the Exxon Valdez oil spill. The coalition* underscores the call for effective policies that reign in windfall profits and bad corporate behavior.
